Two centuries of finca soul, salt flats, and open sea

At the southern tip of the island, where the land flattens toward salt pans and open water, Villa Margo rises from a 30,000-square-metre estate that has been quietly accumulating history for two hundred years.

The original finca — stone-built, thick-walled, unhurried — has been restored into two connected houses that together sleep twelve across six bedrooms, their interiors layered with heritage beams, warm plaster, and the kind of considered furnishing that never announces itself. From the terraces, the view takes in the shimmering expanse of the Mediterranean, the protected wetlands of Ses Salinas, and on clear days, the low silhouette of Formentera. Salinas and Es Cavallet beaches are minutes away by car. Inside, sunlit living rooms open onto shaded lounging areas; a pool table and bar invite long, unhurried evenings.

Picture the afternoon light moving slowly across the salt flats, a glass in hand, nowhere pressing to be.
